Whispers from The Brighter World

Sunday, August 4, 2013 – 10:00 a.m.

There's always something to say; everything here below repeats itself tirelessly. Physical and spiritual bodies have the same requirements; this characterises the human being, who is subject to inescapable laws. As for the soul, it aspires to the Divine; this inner thirst can prove unquenchable. True mystics do not tire of repetition in this field, in rituals or in the assimilation of texts proposed to them. It is important for them to thus meet the soul's deep longing to be nourished by the emanation of the Divine. In this register, there is no shortage of lessons. Seekers can go through experiences and one day find the way that suits them. There lies the ultimate step for each one; they know they are on the right track and they truly commit themselves to it with varying degrees of fervour, but they are on the path, one that reassures them in this innermost need for a redeeming quest. They instinctively understand that their choice is good, and they commit themselves with varying degrees of determination.

Nothing should be forced in this area. We do our best for the abhyasi, and everything falls into place as naturally as possible. We are not forcing anything or anyone; a real need is being met here. Blessed are the beings involved in a true process with this unique prospect: to truly rise towards a mystical ideal.

Everything in life happens in a timely manner when the call is sincere and the aspirant determined. Thus begins for the aspirant a real work whose outcome is promising. May the multitude arrive at this conclusion. Everything has its raison d'être here below; a true spiritual path is the culmination of a lifetime.
