Whispers from The Brighter World

Wednesday, January 29, 2014 – 10:00 a.m.

Trials are necessary for humans; each one is like a musical note, all of them making up a sad song – a song accompanying a person's fate for his or her own good and finally very beautiful in its effects. Everything has its importance; didn't the greatest saints also suffer, and they grew, as others still do today in similar circumstances. Doesn't everything have its raison d'être! Without worries and trials, incessant for some, an incarnation would not have its true meaning. It takes a long time to understand this and also to accept what fate, in its diversity, has in store. To grow in wisdom – there lies the real goal, the noblest of all. Nothing is simple for any living being; other kingdoms here below are not spared either. Life is a whole, and to each its own fate, whatever it may be. It is so willed for the good of those who live on Earth. Everything is in everything, and all is counted here below. It is not easy to understand all these subtleties, and it takes some time to accept this reality: the divine power acts at all levels of creation and of consciousness as well. Human beings are quite small in the face of it – a breath, a nothing, that is what they are as matter, but the energy that dwells in them is more subtle and nuanced in its effects. Spiritual work can change them to some extent, when destiny so provides. Let us repeat, everything has its raison d'être: it is up to one and all to become aware of this higher reality and to act in order to deepen, as much as they can, their understanding of what a spiritual path can provide in transforming a life at this level. Everything is possible; it is up to each one to understand it.
