Monday, June 12, 2000 - 10:00 a.m.

Psychoanalysis is on the wrong track on many points. Without spiritual light, it does not work out the issue of the heart of the being. In each human being, a closed world, a kind of city invisible from outside, bubbles. Man does not necessarily have access to it. He cannot decipher signals that are unknown to him, and which a psychiatrist can interpret according to his criteria, without succeeding in unravelling its complexities. The complexity of this true nature remains a mystery. Man manages, sometimes, following dreams or repeated experiences, to seize the true meaning of his life. However open-minded and informed he may be on the secrets of his nature, it will remain until the end, an enigma for him. He will be able, in the best-case scenario, to have some insight that will make him foresee reality. This thread will encourage him to follow the path of knowledge and to call, in his deepest being, the guide who will be able to lead him towards the Promised Land."

Babuji