Whispers from The Brighter World

Friday, May 21, 1999 – 10:00 a.m.

Beware of your own reasonings, even if you all think you're smart.
Have the humility to see yourselves limited to a very small sphere.
All the fine dissertations you can give on this or that aspect of life are questionable.

Don't have too many illusions about your own person. We watch you as parents do with their children, and your simplistic little theories amuse us, even if you believe you have discovered the alpha and omega.

It is good to analyze, to reflect on all that surrounds you, and especially on what you do not understand.

But don't have final opinions and don't believe you hold the truth.
You would be completely mistaken.
Meditate well on all that and, above all, remain simple.
