The fatigue these messages cause you is such that you do not truly realize their importance. They express ideas that a living Master cannot say or write.

We have put forward some rather forceful arguments in the previous collection. How could your Master have said those things? We must proceed gently in approaching certain truths, so as not to shock you all.

My son's words, however moderate and thoughtful, are often distorted.

Abhyasis take their desires for realities and spread falsehoods, as happened before and after the celebrations.

We must be very careful; even so, tempers often flare, and people make up unfounded stories.

This is another human characteristic. They start with a piece of information, a sentence, sometimes a word, to extrapolate and imagine what does not exist. You all must be vigilant about all these rumours, which disturb many of you if they are repeated and amplified.

Human beings are imaginative, and if it's in a good way, that's a quality, but one must know not to go too far. The proof of this is in the circumstances we have just described.

Remain cautious, get your sources confirmed by reliable people, and all will be well.
