Monday, October 2, 2000 - 10:00 a.m.

While writing, you do not miss anything of your meditation; the transmission continues, rest reassured on this point. The comments made on these messages will be an additional advantage; we inspire 'the author' for that. They will conclude this 'Epilogue' and the whole of the messages. You should envisage translating this text so that my son can take note of it when the time comes. He would take it as an introduction to all this work. Think of it and polish it up, both the comments on the necessity of not suppressing anything and the interpretation of the titles of the collections. They also have their raison d'être; the choice is justified, yet that remained to be understood. As we move on, you can note, as far as you are concerned, that regular reading widens your comprehension. What seemed to you insignificant, and superfluous in the beginning, can be understood differently today.

"It is the objective which we wish to achieve: to bring you to interiorizing yourself sufficiently so that in its simplicity, this truth which emanates from the whole, unfolds to you and reaches your heart. Such was our goal."

Babuji